

Future Trends in PM

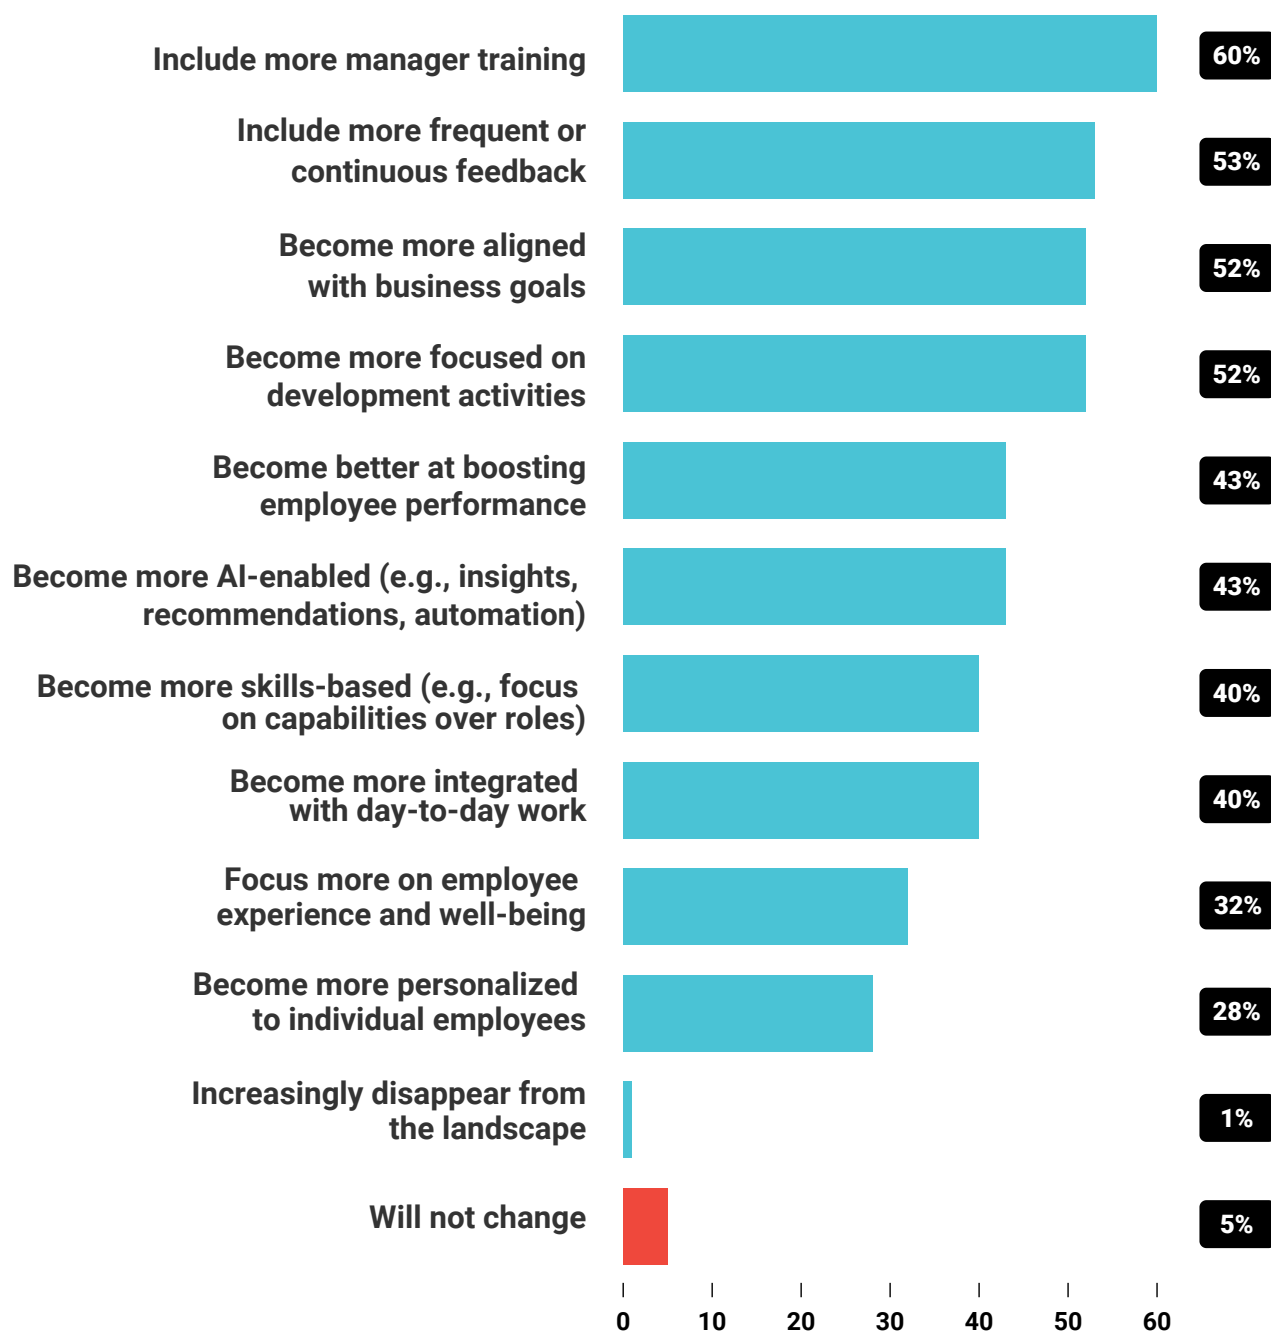

Finding: Organizations most commonly say performance management in the future will include more manager training

What's predicted to happen in the world of PM over the next two years? A majority of organizations anticipate performance management will include more manager training (60%). This will help address the issue where managers are often promoted for excelling as individual contributors, but aren't prepared to lead, coach, or evaluate others. Without dedicated training, many are left to run reviews, feedback conversations, and goal setting on instinct rather than a defined skill set.

About half also believe PM will become more aligned with business goals (52%) and incorporate more frequent or continuous feedback (53%) over the next two years. Development-focused change (52%) follows closely behind, suggesting a strong shift toward proactive, growth-oriented practices rather than purely evaluative ones. AI-enablement (43%) and skills-based approaches (40%) also register meaningfully, pointing to emerging shifts in both technology and philosophy. Fewer organizations expect change centered on employee experience and well-being (32%) or individual personalization (28%), suggesting these areas may lag behind more structural or process-driven changes.

Only 5% expect no change at all, and just 1% believe performance management will disappear entirely, indicating near-universal consensus that evolution is coming, even if organizations differ on where to focus first.

In your organization, how will performance management change over the next two years? (select all that apply)

Editor's Note: In the original data, 17% of respondents stated that they "don't know." We removed those responses and recalculated, so this only shows percentages for those who substantively answered the question.

Only 1% believe PM will disappear in the near future